bare, And howling hurricanes each other chased And nature seemed a dreary blasted waste ! On one wide plain an humble co-tage stood Unshelterd from the storm by ledge or wood, In which a loving pair in slience sat And no one with them but their boy and cat, List'ning with horror to the storm's wild blast And hoping every gust would be the last.— . At length the moth r bore her sleeping child To his soft bed, and o'er han gently piled The warm, the's blankets that his rest might be As sweet for all the tempest's savage glee : And then 'returned to where the cheering light And then 'returned to where the cheering light Of fire and love relieved the gloomy night. nigher, No effort could exclude the dismal fright A moment thus they sat when loud and wild A shriek was uttered by their darling child As tho' some goblin waked him from his d As the some goblin waked him from his dream Or inward pain had caused the piercing scream ! Each parent's cheek with apprehension paied And both their hearts with sudden terror quailed, As each now flew in haste to ascertain What sudden blow had caused that cry of pain; The boy was sitting upright in his bed With both eyes starting wildly from h s head, And when they begged to know if he was hurt lie toid them with a groan that a big hungry bed-bug had nabbed him tremendously under his UBADIAH.

> For the Journal. QUARTER-DECK MUSINGS.

I hear the whistle of the quail, The voices on the road ; The music of the farmer's flail In this vast solitude ; The patter of the busy mill, The chirping of the birds The shouts of boys upon the hill The lowing of the herds ; The merry farmers raking hay ; I smell the sweet pertunne I hear the little girls at play, The water in the flume I hear the waggon on the bridge, The waving o the trees; The humming of the tiny midge Wandering upon the breeze The muranur of a gentle voice "Come, come from off the sea ; "Oh, let mine eyes once more rejoice "In gazing upon thee," "In gazing upon thee," But gentle eyes, and voice, and tongue, Must wait and hope awhite; Then may thy song of joy be song, And thy dear face may smile. Blest, we wander hand in hand, Happiest we in all the land, Bound together by love's band. Loved and loving through the vales Listening to the summer gales To tell our joy all language fails. How sweetly bloom the fragrant flowers How swiftly pass the rosy hours How soothingly the diamond showers. No more days of loneliness No more nights of dire distress Thou and I each other bless. No more tears of vain regret Hearts that love have glacily met We will both be happy yet. This is idle, vain I know Priving for the hours to go But I want my darling so Dark days have passed, I've ceased to roam Vestward o'er the sea I've come. Her true heart my happy home. J. W.
